In international humanitarian law, a territory is considered occupied when it is actually placed under the authority of the adverse foreign armed forces.

The occupation extends only to the territory where such authority has been established and can be exercised. A State's territory may therefore be partially occupied, in which case the laws and obligations of occupation apply only in the territory that is actually occupied. When a State consents to the presence of foreign troops there is no occupation.

Detailed rules set out the rights and duties of the occupying forces which are, generally speaking, bound to take the necessary steps to restore law and order and public life and maintain them as well as possible while respecting the laws in force, unless absolutely prevented from doing so.
